<dc:subject>Cities Transit (Albany, Ga.)</dc:subject>

<dc:description>This compilation of WSB newsfilm clips of Albany, Georgia, from 1962 includes scenes of the Albany Movement-led bus boycott; silent shots of Dr. William G. Anderson, president of the Albany Movement, speaking with attorney C.B. King in a law office; a mass meeting at Shiloh Baptist Church with freedom singers and comments by Anderson; and an in-the-street interview with U.S. representative from New York, William F. Ryan. The compilation begins with images of empty buses parked in the Cities Transit lot where an African American man cleans them. Next, Albany mayor Asa D. Kelley states that his greatest fear is a federal injunction on the city. Scenes of mostly empty buses are interspersed with clips of African Americans cycling, walking, and using the carpools organized by SNCC; of white and African American Cities Transit employees working on the bus lot. After the January 12, 1962 arrest of Albany State College student Ola Mae Quarterman, called by some the "Rosa Parks of Albany," and the continued segregation of the bus station's lunch counter, the movement had broadened its boycott to include the city's bus line. Moreover, Cities Transit did not employ any African American bus drivers. The success of the boycott caused the cessation of bus service during parts of February and again from March 6 through 1964. Next, Freedom Singers including Bernice Johnson, Rutha Harris, and Charles Jones sing with the audience "Rise, Shout, Give God the Glory" and chant "Freedom!" in Shiloh Baptist Church. In speaking to the crowd at Shiloh, Anderson invokes religious imagery to encourage the fight for freedom, criticizes the continued segregation of Albany High School, and condemns the misuse of laws to maintain segregation. He calls upon the U.S. Justice Department to step in and encourages Albany's African American community to continue action. In the mass meeting, Anderson and others wear black arm bands to protest Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr.'s and Reverend Ralph Abernathy's July 10 convictions "for exercising their conscience." The men had been arrested with more than 250 others on December 16, 1961 for parading without a permit. Anderson is also seen in an interview outside city hall with New York congressman William F. Ryan. Ryan came to Albany at the request of the Congress of Racial Equality (CORE) and the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC) to report on local conditions to Congress and to help awaken the whole country to the situation in Albany. Ryan gives his full endorsement to the Albany Movement and its "peaceful demonstrations," and calls for Congress and the Justice Department to intervene. Ryan agrees to speak to a local news reporter, probably from the Albany Herald, as his schedule permits; he also offers to return to Albany if needed.</dc:description>

Welcome

During the Civil Rights Movement, ordinary men and women challenged the nation to apply its founding values of justice, life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness to all citizens, regardless of skin color. From throughout the south women, men, and children of different social classes, educational levels, races, and religions united in a national effort to practice the principles of democracy, nonviolence, and civic action.

This web site spotlights their activities out of nine cities and towns in Georgia, from the Supreme Court's Brown v. Board of Education decision of 1954, to the anti-poverty and anti-war campaigns of the early 1970s. Browse these pages to see video from the era, shot by photographers at WSB-TV/Channel 2 News (Atlanta) and WALB-TV/Channel 10 News (Albany). Funded by the Institute of Museum and Library Services, this video has been restored and preserved online by the Civil Rights Digital Library Initiative. The University of Georgia permanently houses the news footage in its Walter J. Brown Media Archives.

Albany

The Albany Movement transfixed national attention on Georgia, and laid the philosophical groundwork for the historic 1963 March on Washington. Months before local NAACP leaders invited Dr. King, Rev. Ralph Abernathy, and members of SNCC and the SCLC to their quiet southwest Georgia city, blacks and whites in Albany banded together to dismantle Jim Crow and to press for immediate legal, educational, and political reforms. The Movement was officially activated on November 17, 1961.

Inspired by the success of the Montgomery, Alabama, bus boycotts, those who joined the Albany Movement determined to end discrimination in all segments of society: in public transportation, schools, and hospitals; in restaurants and other dining establishments; in the public libraries; in business and government. High school students from the city's segregated schools, youth from the historically black Albany State College, and poor people from town as well as farms in surrounding counties, were the most visible participants as they marched in picket lines, conducted sit-ins and voter registrations, risked expulsion from school and job loss, and endured beatings and starvation in jail.

The process of dismantling Jim Crow also took subtle forms. For example, school teachers would slip students Civil Rights news from the northern papers to read secretly at home, and maids would attempt to win support from sympathetic white employers.

Perhaps the most striking and memorable aspect of the Albany Movement, and a central catalyst for its longevity, was the religious commitment so clearly at its core. The Albany
